Introduction

Operating a small business is demanding and time consuming. Not only are you focused on the actual work of the business (e.g., product sales, graphic design, coaching, or consulting), you are responsible for planning, administrative tasks, internal operations, new client development, communications, and marketing and advertising. Efficiency, time management, consistent quality, and productivity are key to your business success. Templates can help.

Here are the top signs that your business needs templates:

You are wasting time creating similar documents over and over

You are bogged down by administrative tasks

You aren't answering questions or responding to requests in a timely fashion

Your documents and graphics aren't cohesive, they're unprofessional, and they don't accurately reflect you or your brand

You put off long-term planning because you don't know where to start

You are spending hours on social media posts, emails, one-off ads etc.

Are Templates Worth the Time Investment?

People often put off template creation because it feels like an overwhelming task. They end up preparing documents or graphics on the fly, as needed, without taking the additional time to make them customizable and flexible for future use.

If you refer to the 'Urgent/Important' matrix, templates seem to fall into the category of 'important but not urgent'. Their creation is constantly derailed by 'important and urgent' and 'not important but urgent' tasks. But the case for prioritizing template creation is a strong one.

Taking the time to create templates will benefit your business in many ways:

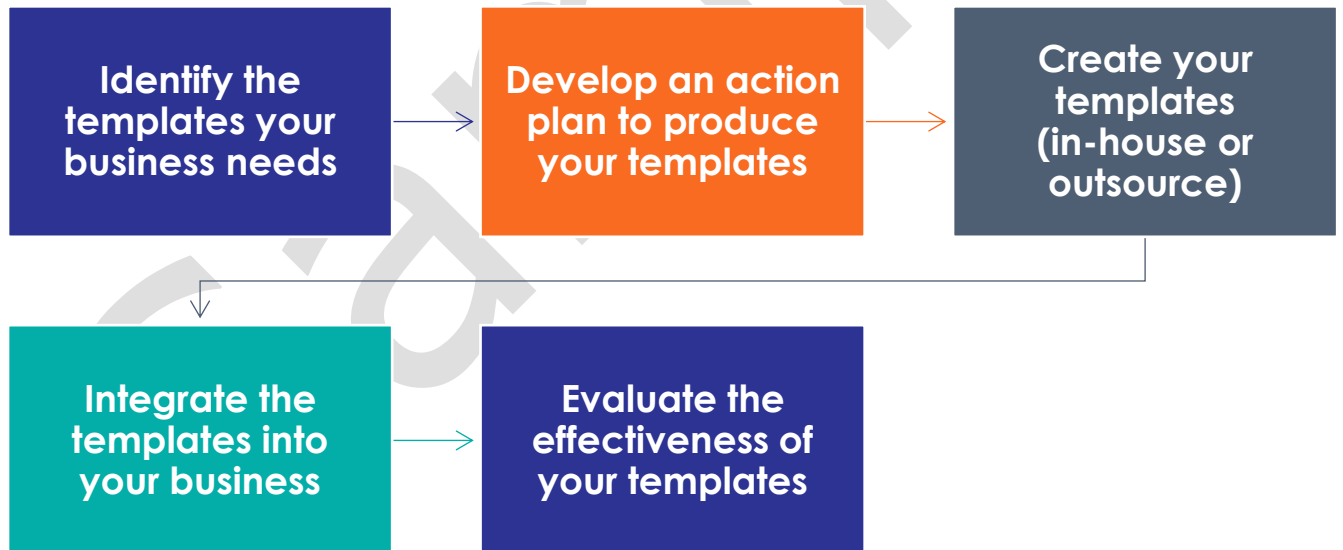

- Saves you time and resources in the long run
- Increases efficiency, productivity, and quality
- Reduces human error
- Produces consistent communications, messaging, and branding
- Contributes to smoother, more seamless operations
- Boosts profitability as a result of all the above

Templates can get a bad reputation. Some say they lack creativity, are impersonal, or are unprofessional (if you use a common, recognizable template). But it's not the concept that is faulty, it's the delivery. You need to make templates your own. Customize them so that they work for you and accurately reflect you and your brand. When done right, templates establish consistency, save time, limit human error, and boost productivity – all while maintaining the critical elements and personality of your business.

What exactly do we mean by a 'template'? A template is any kind of document or graphic with a preset layout, formula, and/or style that is saved for re-use later. They provide the foundation for a document or graphic that can be modified and then resaved with a new name. Templates remove the need for constant recreation of similar documents, saving you time and ultimately contributing to your bottom line.

By the time you complete this course, you will know exactly which templates will give you the highest impact on your business productivity, efficiency, consistency, and quality. Plus, you'll have a clear process for creating those templates. You'll even be well on your way to creating the most important ones for your business, with a solid action plan for moving forward.
