Summary of Content Rules:

Please note that you can use your content almost anywhere that you normally publish and sell content, including editing it and adding your name or brand.

However you can NOT give anyone the Private Label Rights (PLR), Resell Rights, or Master Resell Rights. In other words, you can NOT give other people the ability to edit or alter the content. The exception is any worksheets or forms that your customers need to use to complete activities.

After editing any content, including website links and branding, you should convert it to pdf or other non-editable format to protect the value of your content. There are free pdf converters available online. If you are using Word or OpenOffice, you can simply save the documents as the file type "pdf".

Promotion material (such as tweets, blog posts, quote images, and infographics) can be published freely on the web.

When you are selling any of the products, please do not price them any lower than $7 for a short report/eCourse or $37 for a longer training program. If you sell your products for too little, it makes your content look like it isn't worth much. That defeats the purpose of your business and devalues the content for everyone else too. Also, if you give your larger products away for free, without even asking for an email address, people will never want to actually buy anything from you!

Rules for Graphics and Images:

For infographics and quote images, you can add your name and edit text and images, but you may not sell them or extract any images. If you want to replace any images, you can find more on free and paid stock photo sites or Presenter Media.

For images in Microsoft Office slides and docs, you may not extract and use the images, graphics or templates elsewhere. Images are typically taken from Microsoft's library, free stock photo sites, or Presenter Media.

Please refer to the image source and related license in the Slide Notes section or the end of the documents. Also, you may NOT resell the presentations or any part of the slides in any format.
